Guidance for Faculties, Departments and Schools on Competition and Market Authority (CMA) compliance

The University has a responsibility to comply with consumer protection law (see below) because all prospective and current students have rights which are defined and protected by consumer legislation, irrespective of the level or type of study. The Competition & Markets Authority (CMA) has issued guidance¹ specifically aimed at Higher Education Institutions (HEIs) which should be followed.

What is the legislation?

- The Consumer Rights Act 2015
- The Consumer Protection from Unfair Trading Regulations 2008 (CPRs), and;
- The Consumer Contracts (Information, Cancellation and Additional Charges) Regulations 2013 (CCRs)

What does this mean?

Students have additional legal rights as consumers in relation to the courses provided by the University, in return for payment of fees. The University must provide students with accurate, accessible and material information on the courses offered, their structure, fees/costs and any procedures or regulations by which they will be legally bound before they make a decision to apply. Material information is defined as anything on which a student will rely in making their decision to apply to and/or accept an offer at the University. What information would reasonably be considered material will depend on the course, but is likely to include details such as the programme learning outcomes, whether the programme is delivered in person or online, and how much choice students would have in regard to optional papers. It is vital therefore that the information provided by Faculties, Departments and Schools is correct, current and consistent with that provided centrally.

Any information that a prospective student receives about their course before they accept their place at the University may then form a term of the contract between the University and the student. This information includes all information on websites, prospectuses or given verbally by staff.

A student's consumer rights last for the course's duration. Any subsequent changes to information from that provided to the student at offer stage must also comply with consumer legislation. If they are material changes, i.e., changes to information on which the student relied when deciding to choose the course (and has not subsequently agreed to), then it is likely that the University will have breached consumer law. Further information is set out below, but it is recommended that advice is sought as early as possible from the Education Quality and Policy Office (EQPO) when planning changes to courses.

If the University fails to provide the course in accordance with the terms of the contract (the offer), then the student may have rights of recourse under consumer legislation. Non-compliance with the law may result in a variety of sanctions against the University, including fines, refunds, price reductions or other financial compensation, as well as significant reputational damage and the possibility of audit or review by the Office for Students (OfS) or the CMA. The Office of the Independent Adjudicator for Higher Education (OIA) is also able to consider complaints from individual students and groups of students about consumer issues.

Faculties and Departments may be expected to meet any financial costs resulting from a breach of CMA compliance. Please note that these costs may be significant.

The CMA Guidance, in summary, states that HE providers must:

- 1. Give sufficient, clear, accurate, accessible and timely information about the courses they offer, so that prospective students may make an informed choice of institution and course;
- 2. Provide clear terms and conditions to students and prospective students about rules that apply during their course of study;
- 3. Draw unusual terms and conditions to the attention of students and prospective students;
- 4. Not change the course from that advertised without good cause and due notice and, in some cases, explicit consent to the change;
- 5. Offer clear and robust complaints procedures if students are dissatisfied with their educational experience.

What does this mean for Faculties, Departments and Schools?

The University has taken steps to address all points above, in particular issuing standard terms and conditions to all applicants (see 'Further Information' below), ensuring that information held by the Cambridge Admissions Office (CAO) and the Postgraduate Admissions Office (PAO) is accurate, and empowering the Office for Student Complaints, Conduct and Appeals (OSCCA) to act in the event of student dissatisfaction.

However, due to the devolved nature of the University's business, a significant amount of information is provided to students directly. Faculties, Departments and Schools are expected to understand the requirements under the CMA Guidance to ensure that the University is consistently offering clear and robust information at all levels.

Information for students

For prospective students, any central information such as that held by CAO, PAO and ICE is considered to be the primary source with regards to advertising courses to prospective students. Any information held on other websites, and printed material, should be reviewed to ensure the following:

- 1. University-level policies and procedures should not be replicated on departmental websites under any circumstances; however, in all cases it is important to ensure that these policies are drawn to students' attention. This information should be linked to the relevant University webpage; see Appendix 2 for further information.
- 2. Departments may wish to present supplementary information for applicants. This should complement and not replicate information already presented by Education Services². All information on websites forms part of the pre-contract information considered by the applicant so departments should be mindful of the accuracy of this information and that all elements can be delivered as described.

- In order to avoid confusion and ensure transparency, Faculties, Departments and Schools should not use the term 'prospectus' on their own sites; the only 'prospectuses' are those held centrally.
- 4. If your course is accredited by a professional body, all information must clearly reflect the particular cohort(s) that will be accredited, along with any required subject pathways.
- 5. Any practice that may be considered unusual, for example additional course costs, must be explicitly drawn to the attention of prospective students before the offer stage. Additional course costs must not be changed after the offer stage, and they should not be changed once advertised unless the change will have a demonstrable positive impact on students.

For current students, Faculties, Departments and Schools should ensure information in course handbooks or websites/Moodle sites accurately reflects the Regulations as set out in the Statutes and Ordinances, and is consistent with University policies and procedures. As above, central University policies, such as complaints procedures, should not be replicated in departmental information to students but should be drawn to students' attention and linked to the relevant central website.

Course changes

It is acknowledged that in practice, some degree of flexibility regarding course content will be necessary and, in a research-led institution, appropriate to ensure that teaching consistently reflects discipline developments. However, it is vital that course changes are within the bounds of what has already been advertised to students (and within the relevant student Terms of Admission of the offer), and are not changes which students would view as material, or disadvantageous to them. Undergraduate and postgraduate Terms of Admission contain clauses headed 'Changes to your course' which sets out where changes might be permissible. Faculties, Departments and Schools should strive to balance the need for detailed and clear information to enable student choice, with future planning and sustainability.

When planning for course changes, consider the following:

- 1. Is there sufficient lead time for the change, ensuring that students (including current and prospective students) will be neither confused nor disadvantaged as a result of the change?
- 2. If the change will impact on current students, is express consent needed?
- 3. Are there any courses or papers that you offer which are heavily reliant on one individual? If so, what planning is in place for covering that person's teaching should they go on sabbatical, long-term illness, retire, or choose to leave the University? If no cover is possible and the teaching is withdrawn, can the course or paper still be delivered?
- 4. Do the changes affect the learning aims or outcomes, or mode of assessment of the course? If so, this will likely result in a longer lead time for the change, and possibly require approval from the General Board's Education Committee.
- 5. Do changes affect course accreditation and/or student registration with and membership of any professional body?
- 6. Changes to additional course costs will not be approved for any current students.
- 7. Additional course costs can only be advertised and introduced once central approval has been secured.

APPENDIX 1 – CMA CHECKLIST FOR SCHOOLS, FACULTIES AND DEPARTMENTS

Faculties and departments may be expected to meet any financial costs resulting from a breach of CMA compliance. Please note that these costs may be significant.

Course information which is unique to the department (including webpages) complements central information, is accurate and deliverable.
Central University policies – such as complaints and appeals procedures, fee information and application information – are not replicated in departmental information, such as websites and student handbooks, but instead students are referred to the central University webpages (see Appendix 2 for further details).
Faculties and departments do not use the word "Prospectus" for applicant information.
Changes to courses are discussed with students via existing consultation routes, taking account of appropriate lead times.
The status of course accreditations is clear to students.
Prospective applicants, applicants, offer-holders and current students receive clear approved information on any additional course costs.
All academic and professional services staff supporting Open Days are fully briefed on their responsibilities with respect to the requirement to give accurate, clear information about the courses, department and University within their specific remit.
 All published documentation includes the following information: Academic year to which it pertains Owner (person, role or Committee) Version no., if applicable Date produced Date of last review, if applicable Date of next review

APPENDIX 2 – UNIVERSITY DOCUMENTS

The following documents should never be replicated, but it is important to ensure that these are drawn to students' attention. You should include the following items, via the links below, in any student handbooks, intranets, websites or other guidance.

These documents are provided to prospective students with their offer of admission, and form part of the terms of admission for students at the University.
